

First replacements for our Army of occupation sails for Europe. For some of these boys this is their second trip overseas. Others are re-enlisted men who did not get across, and some have never seen service before.

By International Film Service.

The Yankee boy's wash day in Germany. He is taking a lesson in laundering from a peasant woman on the bank of a stream flowing into the Rhine.

By Central News Photo Service.

The German Officer Today--He Has Joined Ranks of Street Merchants

Photographs made in Berlin.

Once a proud Prussian officer who did not hesitate to use his boots on the men under him, and now selling biscuits to the passers by.

© Press Illustrating Service.

This fellow sells cigarettes, the latter made up mainly of tissue paper and sawdust.

© Press Illustrating Service.

There is always a good market for frankfurters in Berlin, no matter what they are made of, so this officer will keep the wolf from the door.

© Press Illustrating Service.

The Huns still seem to have plenty of Moselle and Rhine wines, but the officers who sell them on the streets charge high prices, plus the war tax.

© Press Illustrating Service.

Printing cards for the passers by. The calling card of the Prussian officers in France is known as "the mark of the Hun."

© Press Illustrating Service.